In this lab, I've created a basic network topology featuring two branches: New York and Tokyo. Each branch contains two PCs, a switch, a router, and a firewall, all connecting to "the internet." The setup demonstrates a scenario where an attacker intercepts traffic between the two branches, illustrating how sensitive data and valuable information can be compromised during transmission. This topology provides a foundational view of network security and potential vulnerabilities in inter-branch communications.